the news. the views. the juice.

The 5 stereotypes of journalists in Bollywood

16 August 2013

In the 1983 hit comedy, Jaane bhi do yaaro, Naseeruddin Shah and Ravi Vaswani work as freelance photographers for Khabardar, a muckraking magazine edited by “Shobha Sen”, played by Bhakti Barve Inamdar

Much as the role of the hero and the heroine has morphed in the Hindi film industry, so has the depiction of the villain and the vamp—and, of course, the journalist.

From a pure print person till well into the late 1980s, the journalist on film is now largely a TV person.
From a poorly paid, poorly dressed, paan-chewing jholawala working for a “cause”, we are now (largely) shown as slick, loud-mouthed, loose-tongued buffoons, in bed with the crooked and the corrupt, and not very different from them.

Two young London-based Indian journalists, Ruhi Khan (formerly of Hindustan Times, Mumbai Mirror & NDTV) and her husband Danish Khan (formerly of Mid-Day and Mumbai Mirror), have analysed 33 films over the last 30 years and written a paper for the journal “The Image of the Journalist in Popular Culture (http://ijpc.org)” published by the University of Southern California at Annenberg (http://annenberg.usc.edu/).

“Our analysis revealed five popular representations of the journalist that we have classified as romantic companion, glamour chaser, investigative superhero, power magnate, and brainless mouthpiece.

“These categories, though distinct, can also find themselves sharing screen space and often overlapping in the same film’s narrative.

“These stereotypes have been so strongly entrenched in Bollywood scripts that even films inspired by real-life incidences fail to break free of them.”

Here, the Khans introduce their work.

***
By RUHI KHAN (http://ruhi-khan.blogspot.in/) and DANISH KHAN (http://urdufigures.blogspot.in/)

Working as journalists in India’s tinsel town Mumbai—home to Bollywood cinema, one often comes across various public prejudices against the reporter. From being revered and trusted to help foster change for the better, to being accused of trivialising the profession or manipulating news for profits.

The IJPC article (http://ijpc.org/journal/index.php/ijpcjournal/article/view/38/63) stemmed for our desire to find out how such public perceptions are influenced. In this article we analyse only one element – perhaps one of the greatest factors that can affect mass perceptions—Bollywood films.

Most commercial films are not a prism reflecting reality, but a figment of someone’s imagination and desire to see the world as he or she would like to. Hindi film is devoid of much reality and is often an exaggeration, yet it defines its audience’s aspirations and perceptions.

And this is what the article (http://ijpc.org/journal/index.php/ijpcjournal/article/view/38/63) reflects—the caricature images of journalists portrayed by Bollywood, from their most Romeo-like romantic image to their most macho Rambo superhero.

We analysed 33 films over a 30-year period from 1981 to 2011, ranging from “Mr. India” to “Rockstar,” where the role of the journalist or media has been important in the film’s narrative script or has been entrenched in public memory for its journalistic aspects.

Our analysis revealed five popular representations of journalists. We found many Bollywood films depicting journalists as a Romantic Companion to the other lead protagonist. This is where the focus is on the scribe’s singing, dancing or seducing skills rather than his reporting.

A more realistic category is the Glamour Chaser where reporters are portrayed as flies fluttering around a ‘celebrity’ candy. Need we say more on this, doesn’t seem much difference in real and reel life journalists in this category?

In the Investigative Superhero category the journalist makes powerful enemies in the course of his or her investigative work, just like a superhero who takes on the bad guys. This category showed us two opposite depictions of journalists. While the first half of the period in which our analysis takes place showed investigative reporters often paying a heavy price for their work- often being martyrs in the process; in the latter part the journalist began leveraging his or her profession to safeguard himself or herself by garnering the power of the fourth estate and mobilizing public support and scrutiny.

Next, category Power Magnate shows the media as ‘kingmakers’ holding the power to sway decisions on prominent issues. Prominent senior journalists are ‘sense-makers’ where in they have the power to influence how the public should interpret complex issues.

The last category is the one most journalists in real life are very uncomfortable to even acknowledge but the reel gives plenty of examples to entrench it strongly in public memory—the Brainless
Mouthpiece speaks of the most prevalent public perception where journalists are shown as brainless twits who simply follow instructions, bytes, or gossip without questioning anything.

***

Read the full paper: From Romeo to Rambo (http://ijpc.org/journal/index.php/ijpcjournal/article/view/38/63)

***

Raveen Tandon as Shobha De: Glamourous, sexy, brainy, seductive (http://wearethebest.wordpress.com/2012/11/16/30-plus-glamourous-sexy-brainy-and-seductive/)

Look, who wants to play Christiane Amanpour: Kareena Kapoor (http://wearethebest.wordpress.com/2012/11/10/look-who-wants-to-play-christiane-amanpour/)

Emran Hashmi to play Rajdeep Sardesai, Arnab Goswami (http://wearethebest.wordpress.com/2012/04/07/mouth-ka-saudagar-to-play-rajdeep-arnab/)

Journalism film Dev Anand didn’t make featuring Shekhar Gupta (http://wearethebest.wordpress.com/2011/12/05/the-journalism-film-that-dev-anand-didnt-make/)

Will the underworld a hot reporter like Gul Panag? (http://wearethebest.wordpress.com/2012/01/12/will-underworld-dons-trust-such-a-hot-reporter/)

For Sashi Kumar, Ranganath Bharadwaj, acting is second nature (http://wearethebest.wordpress.com/2009/10/04/for-some-journos-acting-is-second-string-in-bow/)

Finally, Karnataka gets an acting chief minister: Ravi Belagere (http://churumuri.wordpress.com/2007/11/22/finally-karnataka-gets-an-acting-chief-minister/)
The 5 stereotypes of journalists in Bollywood | sans serif

This entry was posted on 16 August 2013 at 1:13 pm and is filed under A bit of fun, Issues and Ideas, Magazines, Newspapers, People, Radio, Television.

Tags: Amitabh Bachchan, Arnab Goswami, Bollywood, Christiane Amanpour, Churumuri, Danish Khan, Dev Anand, Emran Hashmi, Gul Panag, Hindustan Times, IJPC, Imae of the Journalist in Popular Culture, jholawala, Kareena Kapoor, Mid Day, Mr India, Mumbai Mirror, NDTV, Rajdeep Sardesai, Ram Gopal Verma, Ranganath Bharadwaj, Raveen Tandon, Ravi Belagere, Rockstar, Ruhi Khan, Sans Serif, Sashi Kumar, Shekhar Gupta, Shobha De, Shobhaa De, WFS

Entries and comments feeds.Valid XHTML and CSS.

Follow

Follow “sans serif”

Powered by WordPress.com